

THE RODNEY KING CASE AND THE LOS ANGELES UPRISING

On March 3, 1991, officers from the Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD) stopped motorist Rodney King for a traffic violation. During the arrest proceedings, King was struck over fifty times with nightsticks after initially resisting police orders. A witness to the event, George Holliday, videotaped the arrest, which was later broadcast on local station KTLA and commercial news networks nation wide.

Within a week following the incident, a Grand Jury returned indictments against the officers involved in the arrest, charging Sergeant Stacey Koon, Officers Laurence Powell, Theodore Briseno and Timothy Wind for the use of excessive force and assault with a deadly weapon.

Over a year after the night of the beating, the LAPD officers indicted in the trial were acquitted of the charges brought against them. As a result of the verdict, many residents of Los Angeles reacted with shock and anger. Some residents took to the streets to protest; others turned to their televisions to watch events unfold. From April 29 through May 15, 1992, television networks devoted extensive resources and airtime to the uprising. The center of much of the resulting activity took place in the South-Central area of Los Angeles, with events spreading rapidly across many parts of the city.
