

PRESERVATION EXAMPLES: SILENTS TO THE DAWN OF SOUND

For the first two decades of the motion picture, feature films as such did not exist. The short subject was the featured attraction in cinemas, offering patrons comedies, dramas, adventures, westerns, cartoons, documentaries, scenics, and trickfilms, all in as little as one reel or less. By the 1920s, the feature-length film of five reels and longer had assumed prominence, and the short subject was relegated as support to create a well-balanced program, a dynamic in theaters that continued well into the sound era.

The UCLA Film and Television Archive strives to achieve a balance in its preservation program between feature films and short subjects. While several hundred features have been preserved by the Archive since the 1970s, more than a thousand shorts have been saved during that same period. Unfortunately, not all of the films preserved by UCLA are pristine. Although some have been reproduced from camera-original negatives and are things of beauty, others have been copied from sole-existing prints which reflect the ravages of wear, mishandling, missing footage, or decomposition present in the surviving material. And while some can be numbered among the most entertaining films ever made, others might be included among the worst. But considering that at least 80 percent of silents – and far too many early sound films--are lost, with the ranks of the unpreserved being thinned steadily due to nitrate deterioration, it is fortunate that we have anything left at all.

The UCLA Film and Television Archive has preserved more than a thousand shorts and several hundred feature films since the 1970s including Molly O' (1921), pictured above, and featuring Mabel Normand and Jack Mulhall.

Presented here is a varied selection of UCLA's preservation efforts in both features and shorts, from the beginning of cinema through the dawn of sound. At the Archive Research and Study Center, you can view the good, hopefully not too many bad, but definitely a few uglies, and relish again the films and artists of yesteryear that for too long have been unavailable to modern audiences.
